

FALL 2013

Digital Learning in the University (IT100)

Are you interested in making digital movies, creating audio podcasts, using Twitter, creating your own website and other digital media? Have you ever wondered how you could harness these digital media and others like them to help you learn more deeply, easily, and efficiently? If so, then Digital Learning in the University (IT100) is for you!

In this course you will learn how to use and develop a variety of computer-based production tools to help you become a better learner. But, more importantly than just using tools, this course should teach you about yourself by helping you become more aware of yourself as a learner. This course also will help you think more carefully about study strategies, reading approaches, and the very definition of learning. You will learn all of this in the context of also learning about SIUE!

In addition to meeting all the criteria for a New Freshman Seminar Course (NFS), this course will satisfy the requirements for an Information and Communication in Society Breadth Category (ICS).
