Applied Communication Studies at SIUE

The study of communication involves the development of theories and research tools to analyze, explain and improve human interaction. Departmental courses focus on two-person interaction, small-group decision making, communication patterns in organizations and other complex systems, public relations, and speaker-audience interaction in public speaking.

Career Opportunities

In America, employers increasingly recognize the need for more effective communication. As a result, job opportunities for graduates trained in applied communication studies are prevalent in business and industry, government agencies, educational systems, nonprofit organizations, and community-based resource centers. Graduates often have several career choices. Examples of communication careers departmental graduates have entered are: teaching and administration; management, training and consulting in organizations; public relations; human relations and employee assistance programs; sales; and government service. Graduates find employment in various types of for-profit and nonprofit organizations locally, regionally, nationally and internationally. Applied communication is also an in-demand minor for students majoring in areas such as, business, mass communications, political science and sociology. Our graduates are also well-prepared for graduate school.

Hands-On Learning

At SIUE, students are encouraged to put their newly acquired skills to work through hands-on activities, service learning and guided internships. Students have the opportunity to work with actual clients on projects in various courses and through the Senior Assignment. At SIUE, we are committed to helping undergraduate majors identify jobs and work environments for which they are best suited, help students select appropriate internships, and help guide students in the selection of minors and elective courses to complement the applied communications studies major.
